Biographical / Historical
Hilda Solis is a politician who represented California in the 31st and 32nd districts in the United States House of Representatives from 2001 to 2009. She later served as President Barack Obama's first Secretary of Labor.
Solis was born on October 20, 1957 in Los Angeles, California. Her father, Raul, was from Mexico while her mother, Juana, was from Nicaragua. Solis, the third of seven children, grew up in La Puente, California and attended La Puente High School. In 1979, she earned a bachelor's degree in political science from California State Polytechnic University, Pomona. Two years later, she earned a master's degree in public administration from the University of Southern California.
After earning her bachelor's degree, Solis worked in the White House Office of Hispanic Affairs in Washington D.C. during President Jimmy Carter's administration. She later worked briefly in the civil rights division of the Office of Management and Budget before returning to California in 1982.
In 1985, Solis was elected to the Board of Trustees for Rio Hondo College in Whittier. She served on the board until 1991, when she ran for California State Assembly. Solis served in the State Assembly from 1992 to 1994, representing the 57th district, and then won the 24th district seat in the California State Senate.
In 2000, Solis defeated incumbent congressman Matthew Martinez in the primary and then ran unopposed in the general election to win the 31st Congressional District seat in the United States House of Representatives. While in Congress, Solis served on several committees, including the Education and Workforce Committee and the Resources Committee. In 2003, she became the first Latina to serve on the Energy and Commerce Committee.
In December of 2008, President Obama nominated Solis to serve as United States Secretary of Labor. The United States Senate confirmed the nomination in February of 2009 and Solis served in that position until 2013.
In 2014, Solis returned to Cal Poly Pomona as a scholar-in-residence. Later that year, she was elected to represent the first district on the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors. She continues to serve on the board in 2018.
