Christopher Emmet interview with Frank Barnett concerning the withdrawal of the United States from Vietnam. Barnett is critical of advertisements in newspapers calling for withdrawal, especially professors who sign these ads even when they do not specialize in international relations nor South East Asia. The men discuss isolationism, non-intervention, and relaxing of tensions in regard to Vietnam and communism in general. Further analyzed is the relationship between public information and the limitations of civil liberties. The interview concludes by discussing the left-right political spectrum and name-calling of fascists, socialists, communists, etc.

Scope and Content Note
Private Robert Thomas speaks about a multi-medium propaganda he'd like to develop entitled, "Uncle Sam's Family." This program would compare experiences of the various ethnic nationalities in Europe to those Americans and European refugees of such decent in the American military. He believes that Europeans will rally behind America when they see that those like them are fighting for democracy and equality to all people. The name was chosen in the idea of that is the most proper description for America, according to Thomas; that America is not a melting pot, but a multicultural nation.
