Scope and Contents
The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom Collection consists of 232 audiocassettes housed in 7 boxes and 38 7" open reel tapes housed in 2 boxes. The collection also contains supplemental print and manuscript materials housed in 4 boxes. The oral history interviews that comprise the collection were recorded between roughly 1979 and 1989. Some of the 7" open reel tapes contain recordings of the 1967 WILPF National Conference at Asilomar. The print and manuscript material have varied date ranges. The interviews are the product of the Women's Peace Oral History project, which began in 1979. As the director of the Women's Peace Oral History project, Judith Porter Adams trained student and volunteer interviewers, coordinated and funded the national project with support of the Jane Addams Peace Association and individual donations, and collected and arranged the materials now housed at the Archive of Recorded Sound. The interviewees include 'rank and file' as well as prominent members who have held state, national, and international leadership positions in WILPF and Women Strike for Peace (many were active in both). With a few exceptions, older women (over 60) were interviewed because of their years of involvement in peace and justice issues. Those who are still alive in the year this collection was processed by the ARS are still dedicated activists in their late 80's and 90's.

Biographical/Historical note
WILPF had its roots in the U. S. Women's Peace party, and was founded in 1915 by 1300 women from neutral and warring nations who met in the Hague, Netherlands to try to negotiate the end of the war, send envoys from their group to nations at war and the U.S., and to urge peaceful resolution and ‘continuous mediation’ to avoid future conflicts. WILPF’s second congress met in Versailles in 1919 where the peace terms were negotiated, and the women’s congress made several long-term resolutions for disarmament, gender equality, and for a world body to negotiate peaceful settlement of conflicts (although WILPF was critical of the League of Nations). President Wilson used many of their proposals in his 14 Point Peace Plan.

Jane Addams, named the first president of WILPF, became the second woman (and the first American woman) to win the Nobel Peace Prize in 1931. Longtime WILPF board member Emily Greene Balch also won the Nobel Peace Prize, in 1946.
The U.S. section of WILPF opposed U.S. participation in WWII (although members supported the troops). In the 1950s, WILPF members rallied against the HUAC hearings. WILPF worked against nuclear testing, and many members also joined the grassroots Women Strike for Peace, a less hierarchical peace-action group. In the 1960s, WILPF was a critical force in the anti-Vietnam War movement. WILPF continues to take a strong stand on issues related to peace and women's equality as a U.N. Non-Governmental Organization (NGO).

The Women's Peace Oral History project was organized by Judith Porter Adams, who began the project in 1979, to celebrate WILPF's 70th anniversary. The project interviewed ninety older women from local California and other states' branches. Adams, her students at Stanford and San Jose State, and volunteers conducted the interviews. The project's goal was to preserve the stories of how the women became committed to peace and justice issues, and what sustained them over their lifetime of activism."

15. Esther Newill Interview 1980-02-20 to 1980-02-23

Creator: Shaw, Linda
Creator: Newill, Esther
Audiocassettes 122 and 123
Audiocassettes 122 and 123 were originally though to contain an interview of Esther Newill by Judy Adams. It was subsequently discovered that they contained audio of Newill interviewing Adams, not the other way around. They have therefore been removed from the finding aid at Adams' request.
