Abstract: This collection comprises materials from an Orange County, California community planning study conducted from 1965-1978, which brought together planners from both campus and community to study a variety of subjects, including the politics of everyday life, transportation, health, population goals, and open space. Materials include correspondence, reports, flyers, brochures, news clippings, news releases, and articles. Much of the material is related to "UCI Project 21," an organization of business and government leaders interested in helping Orange County prepare for the future through its study projects in areas such as urban planning, housing, and environmental quality.

Language of Material: English.

Organizational History
The University of California began offering University Extension programs in Orange County in 1959, six years before the opening of the University of California, Irvine campus. These programs were coordinated from the University of California, Los Angeles campus until the Irvine campus opened in September 1965.

UCI Extension serves the continuing education needs of the community through certificate programs, specialized studies, seminars and lectures, and cultural enrichment programs. Courses are designed to promote career advancement as well as personal development for all age groups.

In keeping with its close connection to the community, UCI Extension has worked to apply the resources of the University to the solution of statewide and urban problems. In 1967, Extension joined with Project 21, an organization of business and government leaders interested in helping Orange County prepare for the future through study projects such as urban planning, transportation needs, downtown deterioration, preservation of open space, low income housing, population growth, and environmental quality. The materials in this collection center on these subjects.

UCI Extension offers a variety of community programs such as the Women's Opportunity Center which provides career-direction programs and services; the Academy for Lifelong Learning which offers educational and cultural programs for retired persons; English and certificate programs for international students; and pre-college programs for students preparing to enter college.
