Historical Note
College Library at the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) is located at the Powell Library Building and supports undergraduate study at UCLA. The name "College Library" was adapted between 1957 and 1958 after the merging of the Undergraduate Library and the Reserve Book Room.
While there is no one single successor to the first UCLA library, College Library's lineage traces back to the original main library at UCLA's first campus on Vermont Avenue. Over the years, numerous special or subject libraries have developed, originally as branches of College Library. College Library represents the core general collection up until the 1964 opening of the University Research Library (now known as the Charles E. Young Research Library). Currently, UCLA has two general collection libraries, College Library and the Charles E. Young Research Library, and the branch libraries are considered libraries in their own right.
